BUSINESS INSIDER Newsletters My account O The United States is $35 trillion in debt. THE FACTS On Fox. Thursday, August 1st Steve Ballmer 9PM ET/PT • 8PM CT/MT Also on YouTube USAFACTS.ORG CAREERS Advertisement 'Unbossing' the workplace could make Gen Zers better at their jobs, hiring experts say Lindsay Dodgson Jun 3, 2024, 7:29 AM CDT □ Save → Share The United States is $35 trillion in debt.

On Fox. Thursday, August 1st.

9PM ET/PT • 8PM CT/MT

Also on YouTube

USAFACTS.ORG

Recommended video

Advertisement

Advertisement

Advertisement

Advertisement

Advertisement

The great "unbossing" could make Gen Zers better at their jobs (stock image). Michael H/Getty Images Companies are cutting middle management positions due to cost cutting and other pressures. The great "unbossing" could make Gen Zers better at their jobs, experts suggest.

workplace autonomy.

Fewer managers might boost Zoomers' productivity and foster

Advertisement

The great unbossing is underway, with companies cutting middle management positions.

Cost cutting, Gen Z's distaste for management, remote working, and increased pressure on performance are all factors in why middle managers are finding their jobs are most at risk during layoffs. But while critics think the repercussions of a flatter corporate structure could be less mentorship and feeling more stress coming from above, according to hiring experts, there are also benefits. And one might be that Zoomers get better at their jobs. Sophie O'Brien, a Gen Z hiring expert and the founder of the recruitment agency Pollen Careers, told Business Insider the role of a middle manager is to effectively "micro-manage juniors."

Advertisement

"But actually, there's evidence to suggest this is not productive and limits people's learning potential," she said. "The most effective team development is when people are given autonomy and the freedom to fail." O'Brien said fresh talent is often better equipped to identify issues with traditional ways of working in a company, which could help with shaking up the structure to be more efficient.

She said that not having a micromanager picking apart their work could benefit Gen Zers who don't feel they need to be "spoon-fed." O'Brien said micromanagers can have a "detrimental impact" on Zoomers' productivity, especially if it's their first job. Advertisement autonomy and flexibility," O'Brien said, "and this can encourage empowerment, creativity, and for them to take full responsibility for Those who are skeptical of companies axing middle managers say it

Advertisement

could mean junior staff won't receive the mentorship needed to

But issues should only arise with this shift if companies don't

They should also be introduced to the leadership team, O'Brien

Advertisement

Reverse mentoring can also help bring an organization together,

O'Brien said, to help give junior employees access to a variety of senior staff and leaders, so they are not stuck with a "terrible boss."

Overall, it's about "trial and error," O'Brien said, and "making brave

"Even just making a change and adopting a growth mindset as a

While millennials are currently most likely in the firing line, the great unbossing can come to anyone. So, it may be a wake-up call for those who are coasting, "quiet quitting," or simply in the wrong job.

Advertisement

Advertisement

"It can cause them to feel demotivated, doubt or second-guess themself, and make them disengage from their work," she said. "Because if their ideas or work is constantly being rehashed or rejected, they'll naturally lose interest in their role." Not having multiple layers of management will give Zoomers "more handle it properly, O'Brien said.

their work."

Doing it right climb the ladder.

One way to ensure young hires feel supported is to introduce mentoring programs, she said, because this will give them first-hand exposure to people from different teams with different levels of responsibility.

added, so they have visibility within the company. Related stories "This not only benefits more junior employees but mentors, too," she said. "We're now in a working world where there can be four generations working together, and the intergenerational divide has never been so vast."

Making room for more conversations between people at all levels "can make for greater empathy, understanding, and better culture," O'Brien said.

decisions."

business can create positive change, even if it fails, because it shows you want to do the best by people, that you won't just stick to the status quo," she said. 'Unbossing' can impact anyone

Catherine Rymsha, a visiting lecturer in management at The University of Massachusetts Lowell, told BI that cutting middle managers "alleviates the time and costs of upskilling and developing them into effective leaders." Companies are cutting managers to "weed out underperforming talent," Rymsha said, "while promoting the next-gen of leaders to aid in both developing those people and keeping an eye on the bottom line."

According to Joe Camberato, the CEO of the fintech marketplace National Business Capital, it all comes down to who brings value and who doesn't.

"If you want to protect your job, don't just focus on your title or job description," he said. "Focus on what brings real value to your company, department, or team, and go above and beyond to make that happen."

Camberato said staffers of all generations, from Boomers to Gen Zers, need to evolve, "especially as technology advances." "You need to embrace change and new technologies to keep bringing value to your company and your position," he said. "If you don't, you risk being left behind without a job." Read next

* Copyright © 2024 Insider Inc. All rights reserved. Registration on or use of this site constitutes acceptance of our Terms of Service and Privacy Policy. Disclaimer | Accessibility | Commerce Policy | Advertising Policies | Jobs @ Business Insider Stock quotes by finanzen.net | Reprints & Permissions International Editions: INTL | AT | DE | ES | IN | JP | MX | NL | PL

Contact Us | Masthead | Sitemap |

Your Privacy Choices